Some topical aspects of socio-psychological ideas about justice

R. Shamileva, Z. Generdukaeva

It is presented an analysis of justice as the most important social value underlying many social norms of behavior of individuals. The point of view in favor of the cognitive-psychological dimension of justice is considered, taking into account the model of social attitudes, norms of behavior adopted by the social community with which the individual identifies himself. It is indicated that psychological well-being is primarily associated with the realization of the interests and needs of various social communities, groups and individuals.

Keywords: justice, social injustice, perception of justice, psychological aspects, individual characteristics, cognitive representations, representations of individuals
