International organizations as the actors of international relations: the problem of political and legal efficiency measurement

L. Popova

It is considered the role of International Organizations in a contemporary world. The paper analyzes the degree of political influence on international institutions to date. Due to examining the works of C. Murphy, V. Rittberger and J. Mearcheimer we come to a conclusion that international organizations are not capable to act as global governors due to specific and sometimes contradicting interests of its member states. The original documents and reports of the United Nations, the Congress of the USA, Amnesty International and the World Bank overviews are used for providing examples and supporting arguments. The author points out, that the ability of an international organization to deal with global problems relies directly upon its member states and not the organization itself.

Keywords: international organizations, UN, WTO, terrorism, supranational regulation, safety
