A new view on the social status of women in the context of historical knowledge in the theory of Joan Kelly

L. Kurbanova, Z. Akhmadova

The article gives an attempt to comprehend a new view on the status of a woman in the context of the historical knowledge of the researcher J. Kelly in order to identify a new vector in the analysis of the place and role of women in postmodern conditions. The tendency is considered where the transformation of established social institutions of society, opens up new horizons for social practices in the "masculine" world. The attempt is made, through a new comprehension in the history of the role and status of the woman J. Kelly, to find the possibility of considering the modern transformation of the role practices of a woman, as a manifestation of a new inner strength, as an extension of the boundaries of its ontological nature.

Keywords: gender history, status of women, women's potential, historical experience of women, masculine history
