

Philosophy and ideology as a theory of world order and its practical application

V. Takhtamyshev

The problem of the relationship of subject areas and functions of ideology and philosophy is considered. Approaches opposing ideology and philosophy and justifying their interdependence are analyzed. It is proved that ideology is genetically related to philosophy and was initially presented as a collection of ideas, the content of which was revealed in the process of their formation, understood on the basis of sensualistic methodology. Later, ideology is widely interpreted as socio-political views focused on the transformation of reality. However, even in this case, ideology relies on the philosophical picture of the world and presents essentially a philosophy that proves its practical significance.
